THE ELECTRIC THEATRE

A Delightful and Amusing Program Furnished

White City Amusement Park, 63rd Street and South Parkway, Chicago, IL (1905)

Among the multitude of interesting features to be contained in White City is the Electric Theatre, otherwise called the Producoscope, described by the promoters as being a decidedly new and up-to-date exhibition of moving pictures.

Although located in a rather unpretentious structure adjoining the Scenic Railway Loading Station on the South, there is no form of entertainment at White City which will appeal more to the pleasure-loving propensities of the people than the programs given in the Electric Theatre.

There are no actors or actresses in this Theatre, but the scenes presented show at times scores and even hundreds in action.

The Electric Theatre reproduces the actions and movements of living persons in a most realistic way and presents scenes which it would be impossible to portray in any other manner than with the aid of rapidly moving films containing actual photographs.

Electric Theatre {Producoscope}

The management of the Electric Theatre sent a special commission to the scene of the war between Russia and Japan for the purpose of taking moving pictures of the historical events occurring there.
